WHAT IS CONTRACT FARMING?

Contract farming is the term applied to commercial arrangements linking farmers and buyers for producing and marketing farm products. It is simply a label to distinguish a farming venture in which there is a reciprocal obligation with a buyer to produce and to purchase from an operation where no such undertaking is present.

Contract pricing may limit a farmer's exposure to the risks of wide fluctuations in market prices, and they often specify price premiums to be paid for commodities with desired levels of specified attributes (such as sugar content in cane).

It is common that the small-scale farmer wants reliable access to the inputs necessary for commercial farming, yet the credit, mechanization, seed, agrochemicals, technical information are either not available or beyond the means of the asset poor. Contract farming offers an opportunity to develop the linkages that are missing for the farmer. The primary goal of support to contract farming is to increase rural revenue.
